Duration:	45 working days (until 31 December 2017)
Location:	Home-based, with visits in the region (Jordan, Lebanon, and Iraq).
Project:	Development of evidence-based policy options and frameworks for the accommodation of refugees and other measures in response to protracted crisis in countries affected by the Syria crisis

---

CONTEXT/BACKGROUND

Background

The conflict in Syria has caused the largest displacement of people in recent times, and has severely strained economic and social systems and related institutions in neighboring countries. The absence of any prospect for a positive solution to the Syrian crisis, combined with an unprecedented influx of refugees, has brought with it substantial burdens for host communities.

The multi-faceted nature of the conflict has challenged standard conflict resolution mechanisms as well as traditional responses to protracted crises. How countries in the region can cope with the ongoing conflict in Syria and the unprecedented demographic shock and what can be done to improve international burden sharing are therefore questions of regional and international concern.

Host communities and host countries are faced with many challenges and questions about how best to cope with the situations they face. Whether living in formal or informal shelters and housing, or hosted by the community, many refugees are suffering from loss of income, loss of productive means and disrupted livelihoods. Host communities and other affected communities may be facing pressure on services, the local economy and rule of law. Given the signs that refugee populations are unlikely to be able to return safely to their homes or new settlement areas in Syria in the near future, national and international partners have started exploring alternative scenarios to effectively address the long-term impact of the unprecedented demographic shock.

There is a general recognition that prevailing policies on refugee's status in host communities were developed under the assumption of an early solution to the conflict in Syria, which implied a rapid voluntary repatriation to their home country. The reality has shown the opposite. One area where improvements are possible is in regulatory frameworks and practices regarding residency, access to employment and services, and access to national and local social safety-nets. The legal status of refugees, local regulations and other formal and informal practices can all act as bottlenecks to refugees' access to assistance, especially those residing in host-communities (which is the large majority). More importantly, some approaches and practice can limit the opportunities of refugees to access livelihood opportunities and to benefit from basic public services. In general, addressing such bottlenecks can reduce the longer-term financial costs and burdens of crisis response. However, circumstances vary from country to country and what would produce the best improvements in one location may be quite different from another

Project Description

The main outcome of the project is to contribute to an effective response for the unprecedented demographic shock generated by the Syria crisis on neighbouring countries through the development of evidence-based policy options and frameworks to address the refugee impact on their fiscal space, social fabric and economies.

Policy options and frameworks will be developed through a comprehensive and inclusive process for examining different approaches used in the region to cope with the impact of refugees, and the issues of resilience and longer-term development. The project will include analysis of: regulatory frameworks and existing and/or planned, formal and informal practices regarding the accommodation of refugees; economic impact assessments and reported spending on responses; impacts in local and regional economies; and consequences for social cohesion, peace and stability.
