1. BACKGROUND

HIV-related stigma and discrimination (S&D) is recognized as a key barrier to HIV prevention, testing, care and adherence to treatment. Currently, PLHIV and key populations and other vulnerable groups continue to face stigma and discrimination when seeking access to health services.

According to the National AIDS Strategy 2017-2030, "[these social problems can become more severe than the disease itself, presenting a major obstacle for access to key services." Confirmed by the most recent data, many key populations do not know their HIV status and half of those who are living with HIV started treatment late (56% of PLHIV had CD4 level less than 200 at first diagnosis, 2016). Moreover, the number of AIDS-related deaths remains persistently high with little decline during the past few years.

Thailand is committed to reduce 90% discrimination against PLHIV and key populations in health care settings by 2030 and has recognized that reducing HIV-related stigma and discrimination is critical in ensuring proportionate and equitable access to services to those most affected, in particular key populations. While significant progress has been made over the last five years to reduce S&D through the introduction of national monitoring systems to measure S&D and the on-going development and expansion of complaints resolution and rights protection system, issues remain, particularly among key populations.

ESCAP Resolutions 66/10 and 67/9 have recommended that member states address reduce levels of social stigma, discrimination and violence, and to increase access to health services, especially for HIV.

Specifically, linkages between the community, community-based systems/organizations and government health care systems are lacking. This includes a lack of capacity and empowerment at the community level and creating a reliable referral system and linkages to treatment within the health care system. The high CD4 levels at first diagnosis demonstrate the need for early testing and treatment and prevention services provided through CBOs and community health organizations which can then be effectively linked to continued care and treatment within the existing health care system.

UNDP is the UN's global development network advocating for change and connecting countries to knowledge, experience and resources to help people build a better life. UNDP's vision is to support countries in achieving the simultaneous eradication of poverty and significant reduction of inequalities and exclusion
