1. BACKGROUND

Under its new Country Programme Document 2013-2015, UNDP's livelihood support is programmed to address social cohesion issues in Myanmar, and is targeted across 311 villages across 07 ceasefire and high-poverty states. To-date livelihood assistance has largely been needs-based, and comprising of capital assistance, training and infrastructure. UNDP wishes to add-value to the work it has started in its target locations by strengthening the twin elements of technological innovations and entrepreneurship.

In May 2014, UNDP undertook a scoping mission on introducing affordable technologies to vulnerable communities. This mission undertook consultations with government institutions at the local level and non-governmental organizations (I/NGOs); and conducted technology fairs that showcased a sample of products (in Mon and Kayin states). These consultations and technology fairs were well-received and demonstrated interest in the ideas and demand for products, and relative purchasing power for affordable products.

Based on findings from the scoping mission, UNDP wishes to implement a 15-month pilot project on AFFORDABLE TECHNOLOGY INNOVATIONS FOR RURAL COMMUNITIES, targeting 100 villages in Shan, Mon and Kayin states.

The objectives of this pilot phase are:

- To increase market access to affordable technologies to poor and vulnerable communities;
- To increase income-generation and enterprise-development opportunities through increased market access to technologies in target locations;
- To use the intervention as a further strategy for strengthening social cohesion among target communities;
- To test model for scale-up across all target locations.

The key principles of this pilot phase are:

- Strengthening social cohesion: Social cohesion will be an underlying thread across the intervention which will aim to a) reduce socio-economic disparities and improve socio-economic opportunities for vulnerable persons and communities; and b) improve intra and inter-community networks, interactions, trust and unity. At the local level, village-based CBOs will play a lead role in planning, mobilization and monitoring activities. The technologies themselves will help improve livelihood and income-generation opportunities directly (of local entrepreneurs) and indirectly (of end-user communities). The action will especially benefit women, directly (local women entrepreneurs) and indirectly by reducing women's socio-economic burdens for example around firewood collection and cooking and improving women's security, for example through improved lighting. The intervention will help reduce local/community conflicts around natural and energy resources, for example, in some communities where there are localized conflicts around firewood shortages.

- Adopting market-based approaches: the intervention will help to connect demand and supply that will be sustainable beyond this intervention and contribute to developing local entrepreneurship capacities.
- Benefitting livelihood development and income-generation: the intervention will provide direct income generating or employment opportunities for local distributors and help individuals and communities to increase productivity and reduce overhead costs.
- Building on past work: As part of its larger livelihood and social cohesion portfolio, UNDP has established relationships with communities in the target locations and with government institutions and I/NGOs at the local level; provided a package of social protection (food-banks), capital grants for agriculture, fisheries, livestock and SME; provided community extension training for agriculture and livestock services; constructed small livelihood and community infrastructure; facilitated interaction, exposure and dialogue activities; strengthened the capacity of community governance mechanisms; and provided livelihood and vocational training. The intervention will build on this work. The network of village-based CBOs are well-placed to lead community mobilization, planning and monitoring activities.

While the feasibility mission showcased a number of innovative technology products, during the pilot UNDP wishes to work with 2 product categories only.

- 1) Fuel-efficient cook-stoves
- 2) Solar products (2.a portable solar lights and 2.b solar chargers).
