Terms of Reference for a Local Firm to Support the Production of “Vaane” Web Series

A. Project Title:

Integrated Governance Programme (IGP)

B. Project Description/Context:

The equal participation of women in decision-making bodies have been ensured by the Maldives Constitution and laws as well as the international conventions that Maldives is party to. This is supported by commitment from member states to remove barriers that hinder women’s participation and to actively promote and ensure their representation and meaningful participation in all governance structures including the elected and appointed bodies. However, around the world, women continue to be underrepresented from decision making processes at local and national level. Globally, the percentage of women in national parliaments is 24.3% and only 20.1% hold ministerial positions¹.

Gender quality is a necessary foundation for achieving inclusive, equitable and sustained development. Development is only effective when the diverse experiences, perspectives and talents of both genders are included. Research has further proven that the proportion of women in parliament greatly influences the issues discussed and the legislations prioritized by women aims to bring positive changes in communities for all groups in society especially children and women². When faced with complex development challenges, legislative bodies with members from diverse backgrounds generally provided more innovative solutions to tackle problems.

While numerous factors contribute to the underrepresentation and limited participation of women in the political sphere, one core factor is the social and gender norms that exists globally and even in the island communities of Maldives. The perception of women as primary caregivers responsible for the family and household chores remain a prevalent view in the society and although women are venturing into the workforce, many undertake the double or triple burden of simultaneously undertaking the caregiving tasks at home posing challenges in pursuing their career. This is further exacerbated by the prevalent view that women are incapable of holding positions of authority, particularly elected positions and the political arena is perceived as immoral and unprincipled and not suitable for a woman. Given these deep-rooted beliefs that have been passed through generations of upbringing, interventions aimed to unlearn these beliefs and thought processes need to target the younger generation and build on their empowerment.

Vaane Camp emerged as an intervention demonstrating the use of sports as a tool to empower young women to engage in community development. Research has proven that sports facilitate prospects for women to participate in public life and community development by promoting confidence, communication, interpersonal skills as well as networking skills³. It further paves way for girl's education and other professional development opportunities. Many female executives also stress that a sports background enhances one's chances of receiving employment⁴. Apart from these benefits it also contests the gender stereotypes of the society and works towards reducing and eliminating such stereotypes and discrimination associated with them, making "sports" an ideal tool for women's empowerment.

Since 2018, UNDP has conducted these Vaane Camps in three islands, HDh. Nolvivaranfaru, Kulhudhuffushi City and Hulhumedhoo in Addu City, training 75 young girls aged 15-25 years in either football or volleyball supplemented with skill building and professional development sessions. The intervention succeeded in providing a safe space for young girls to explore their talents and capabilities and to broaden their mind set in terms of breaking down gender stereotypes that could have otherwise hindered their career progression.

In spite of the positive results from the previous camps, it is unlikely the same can be continued during this year with current situation related to COVID-19. The first case of COVID-19 in Maldives on 7 March 2020 and the subsequent increase in community transmission has resulted in new normal measures that included closure of schools and the move to virtual classrooms. With COVID-19 forcing people into online spaces to stay connected, technology has become a vital tool to continue the engagement with youth who has long proven themselves as a tech savvy generation by having taken both their creativity and drive for change online. With the impacts on COVID-19 pandemic on not only closure of schools but also on employment, the current virtual arena serves as a suitable platform to include young people in meaningful dialogues of achieving gender equality.

As such, UNDP through its Integrated Governance Programme is creating a web series to share the key knowledge and lessons learned from the Vaane modules with young people using novel and engaging methods, and is seeking the services of a local firm to support this production.
